

1.

Construction Knick Knack Attack: A merge in which all orange arrows and flashing lights caution approaching vehicles that the road is closed ahead or that there is a lane reduction. But the idiot is somehow hypnotized in the midst of making a very important decision to get over. People who suffer from this attack find that they are uncontrollably drawn to the flashing arrows against their will and therefore cannot get over before they reach the row of prohibiting orange cones that eventually forces them over into your lane. They usually travel in groups of two or more because this is a very contagious phenomena.

2.

Magnetic Parallel: A maneuver in which the moron operating the vehicle that needs to merge into traffic casually decides that being patient is not worth it. Without so much as a backwards glance or hint of caution, the moron will nonchalantly sweep their vehicle into the targeted lane forcing other vehicles to either stomp on their breaks or move over. You will often find that these drivers also suffer from certain "lane related disorders" as will be covered in chapter 4 "Lanes".

3.

Ramp Coaster Assault: You look to your right and spot a vehicle careening down the entrance ramp at 90 mph into rush hour traffic. You and the tyrant behind the wheel eventually approach the point where the entrance ramp merges into one lane and the opposing vehicle does not want to get behind you but in front of you and the ten other cars that have already passed the entrance