

I WILL KILL YOU

HALO
SCOT

HALO SCOT

I Will Kill You

Copyright © 2022 by Halo Scot

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, scanning, or otherwise without written permission from the publisher. It is illegal to copy this book, post it to a website, or distribute it by any other means without permission.

This novel is entirely a work of fiction. The names, characters and incidents portrayed in it are the work of the author's imagination. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, events or localities is entirely coincidental.

First edition

This book was professionally typeset on Reedsy.

Find out more at reedsy.com

To those we've lost along the way, and to those we've yet to find.

May miracles rise from your shadows.

Cleanup on Wall Street

Alex

Corporate America: a psychopath's wet dream. Land of the free (if you're rich), home of the brave (if you're poor). A melting pot of dream corpses. Sour milk and bloody honey. Creepy Uncle Sam, your mother's brother who asks to see your tits at parties. Yankee Dingleberry. The big, bad, bold US of A. You can do everything as long as it changes nothing. Such opportunity. Such ennui. So many lost souls willing to pay anything to find themselves again. It's my civic duty to help them. How could I turn them away? You got a problem; I got a fix. Sure, it might cost a literal arm and leg, but I'll clean your conscience with my own, dirty my heart so yours shines (fool's) gold.

What would you pay for peace of mind? What is the price to erase regret? Lucky for you, I got an app for that: No Questions Asked, NQA for short (click the money icon to see current deals). It's an easy, user-friendly way to throw dollars at troubles (don't miss Two-for-One Tuesdays). I prey on their desperation; they leech off my generosity. And there is so much desperation. Thank God for New York. No, thank Satan. I am the City That Never Sleeps, and I've poisoned the Big Apple. We're late for my ten o'clock, though, so keep up, and watch out for dog shit. Yup, that shit there, the one you stomped. At least now you smell like freedom.

"Ciao, Tony," the receptionist calls as we enter the building—come along.

My name's not Tony, but people like when I'm Tony, so today, I'm Tony. Tomorrow, I'll be Vinny, Joey, Louie, Frankie, or another name softened with a conniving long "e." Frank is a dick, but Frankie is your friend—a friend you owe money and antipasto and a get-well-soon card for his nonna, but a friend the same. And I don't speak Italian, despite my embezzled accent, but I am half Italian, half Egyptian. There's the lonely truth in the lie stack, and it's best to breed lies from rotten truth, but enough blabbering. We're late, my client's early, and I doubt you got the chops for fancy talking.

"Nice to meet you, Pete," I say, sitting across the table. My client looks ready to shit himself, if he hasn't already. In his NQA request, he listed "body cleanup," blunt and bland with no euphemism or code word—a newbie classic. I don't usually take on newbies, but finances are tight as a CEO's overbite, so newbies we must.

"Tony, hi," Pete says. He sweats through his collared shirt, dank with pit stains and stomach-roll prints. I should pity him, but you know I don't, and he's the one who killed some guy, not me. Well, not this guy. But cross me, betray me, fuck me over, stab me in the back, and I will kill you, too.

Pete stares. I wait. Can't ask questions—part of NQA's holy “Terms and Conditions”—so I let him come to me. He doesn’t.

“Pete, you’re new, I get it, but you gotta give me something, buddy,” I say. “And I can’t ask questions, so spill.”

Pete swallows and eyes the ceiling, hoping God will answer his prayers. But Pete doesn’t believe in God, and God doesn’t believe in him, so the room remains silent and awkward.

“There’s a body on Wall Street,” Pete whispers. “Near the subway station. I stuffed it behind a fence.”

“Behind a fence,” I repeat.

He nods.

“Behind a see-through, public fence,” I say.

Another nod.

I shake my head and tsk-tsk the poor dickhead. “Petie, Petie, Petie—”

“It’s Pete,” he says.

“It’ll be Greg soon if you can’t get your shit together.”

“I didn’t mean to kill—”

I raise a hand, and he stops. “I don’t care, and I don’t want to know. Plausible deniability, and all that jazz.” My lawyers are still up my ass about the last gig. Wasn’t my fault NYPD had a retirement party the same night. I buy most cops, but not all and not those. Then again, Rockefeller Center is a poor choice for slaughter—too much visibility and too many tourists. I should run a webinar on responsible murder...

“Here.” Pete hands me a slip of paper. “GPS coordinates.”

You gotta be shittin’ me. Newbie, indeed. “You wrote it down. Wow. If someone finds this, you’re dead or in jail wishing you were dead. Petie, buddy—”

“It’s Pete.”

“Soon-to-be Greg, fuck up again, and you’ll be asking for papers, not cleanup. If you like living in Manhattan, lie low for a few days. I'll sort this out, but do nothing else stupid."

"Thank you, Tony," Pete breathes with relief. "I owe you one."

"Nope, you owe me $5,239.91," I say, "payable by bank check only. Mail it to the PO box in the FAQs. If I get it within the week, all's good. If I don't, the front page of the New York Times might look familiar."

"Got it."

"Good."

Pete lifts his hand to shake, but I'm already out the door. He's a shit client, but he's got one thing going for him. He didn't mention my scar.

* * *

Ever been to New York? The city, I mean, or "The City," if you worship her. I don't. You shouldn't, either.

It's a city of contradictions: standoffish but sympathetic, distant but diplomatic, preppy but polite, cold but kind. A smile earns you a frown. A nod earns you a shake. Eye contact earns you first spot on the weird list, and small talk is grounds for arrest. Great place to live—for criminals, that is. The American West is too flashy (they notice every smudge in the swank), and the South is too friendly (hard to dump a body where everyone knows your name), but the Northeast is prime for crime (go ahead, cringe—I did).

And I do love crime. Why? Society is curated. You see what they want you to see, and like what they want you to like. Safety nets and security blankets soften our country. Everything is so fucking fake. Except fear. And death. Therein lies reality, the primal beast who trades "please" and "thanks" for knives and bullets, for truth and revenge, and truth is a bloody thing. We're mad in Manhattan—let's make that Madhattan, aka Flotsam City, and I am Batmad...or maybe Batmad in Madhattan just has a sinus infection.

Fuck, I'm preachy today. Pete, aka Petie, aka soon-to-be Greg, made me so. I hate incompetence, and he's the king. I also hate the heat, the gritty sweat, the shadowless sidewalks, and the half-dead commuters pining for sharp-dressed, alcohol-soaked nights.

But it's not night. It's day. And it's hot. Every step unsticks my balls from my thighs, despite my silk briefs. (Don't judge. Georgina gave them to me for Christmas, and you don't question Georgina. You'll meet her soon.)

We got a long walk to Wall Street, though, so we should do a mirror scene, stuck inside my head as you are. How did you get there, by the way? I didn't invite you here, yet here you are. Did Halo send you? Can't trust Scot. Before you know it, you'll fall in love with a monster.

Ah, here's a grimy, fingerprint-greased, sketchy-ad-stickered window for us to use. The reflection is dull, but I'll fill in the edges. At thirty-four years old, I'm tall, dark, and handsome. Well, I'm tall and dark. Handsome is subjective, but no one's told me otherwise. What? Truth isn't arrogance. Aren't we all about empowerment in this day and age? Or does that only apply to celebrity sob stories and politicians' kids? Here, I'll lose half of you, and the half who stays should consider therapy.

Anyway, I'm tall (but not towering), dark (sometimes sultry), and possibly (definitely) handsome, which helps in the horny, nepotism-drenched, business climate. With olive skin, dark brown curls, and gray-green eyes, I stand out in a room but blend into the crowd. I'm lean but not cut, just your average, approachable, everyday man with street-corner charm, a secret-lined smile, and a slight New York accent buffed by Wall Street shine. A white, button-down shirt and charcoal khakis uniform me in the army of the streets: cuffs rolled up, black pea coat draped over my broad-but-not-erotica-broad shoulders. Some would say I'm dashing. Others would call me a douche. Both are preferable to the truth.

That's the part you see: the self-made businessman out for a late-lunch stroll in the City That Never Sleeps. You scoff at his concerns and envy his swagger, but you'd spread your legs in a heartbeat and beg him to bend you over a counter. I straddle intimidating and welcoming—and your thighs, upon request. No, I'm not perfect. Yes, I smoke and drink too much. But this is NYC; the air quality will kill you fastest.

People trust me. People want me. I sharpen charisma and channel mania into drive. He's a handsome fuck, this Tony, sometimes Vinny, sometimes Joey, Louie, or Frankie. But Alex? Who is he?

Here's the part you don't see: knives in one pocket, cigarettes in the other, liquor coupons shoved in my coat. Insomnia-ringed eyes, brow-to-cheekbone scar, voice hoarse from crying myself to sleep. Arm and torso tattoos of Italian and Arabic poems reflect a damaged, softer side, and my thousand-yard stare sees too much and cares too little. All are constant reminders of an unhealable wound. To give my kids a normal, happy, stable life (yes, I hear your surprise at my procreation), I embrace psychopathy...after I lost her.

Shit, that got dark. We're supposed to have fun this book. Let's rewind.

Hello, Reader. I'll call you Bob. Nice to meet you, Bob, though I'm sure you'll regret me by the end. I'm Alex, or Alessandro Osman. My parents got trigger-happy with my first name, but it could have been worse. Ma (Italian) and Mom (Egyptian) fought over shoving all our ancestors on my birth certificate, but the hospital (bless them) vetoed their preferred name: Alessandro Giacomo Domenico Mido Karim Ayad Osman. My six siblings were less lucky, but being the youngest has perks. In the end, Ma gave my first name, Mom gave my last, and they left out the middle to avoid divorce.

Despite my country-sized family, I'm a lone wolf, Red Riding Hood's crush with American Psycho aspirations. Less Goodfellas, more Ocean's Eleven. Knives over guns, cunning over chaos. I will kill you, but only as a last resort, though I've had a surprising number of last resorts. Sure, I maim at will, but kill too soon, and you lose your advantage. Fear is a powerful motivator, and the dead don't fear. I'm not a genius, but I am ingenious, and that's how I survive.

We've reached Wall Street, and clouds threaten a storm. Since summer, every afternoon, the sky rains liquid shits. It's the hottest heatwave on record, the most dogged of dog days. Between swamp-level humidity and wet-fart asphalt, it's a miracle anyone's out at all. New Yorkers hate rules, so we'll sweat through our clothes and pass out from heat exhaustion before we admit it's too hot. But it is too hot, and Pete is too stupid, and this day is a diarrhetic diaper overflowing with regret.

As promised, the bloated corpse waits at Pete's GPS coordinates (stupid as Cupid, that one). At least the murder weapon still hides in the corpse's chest. Bless New York's high weirdness threshold. No one's reported it yet. They think it's a papier-mâché art installation for a college student's thesis.

I burn Pete's paper and call it in. The phone rings, beeps twice, and I say, "Wolves cry hunger: Wall Street Station." Then

I hang up. Unlike Pete's paper, this is an encrypted line. The company motto opens the high-risk extension number, then logs the location. Cleaners will arrive in minutes, so I leave and wander toward white-collar hell.

Good job, Bob. You did all right. A little squeamish at the corpse, but you'll adapt. Don't worry, less of this in the future, more gory fun. I rarely do street work anymore, only when the situation is delicate—meaning Pete is an idiot. We both agree on that, even if you're pissed you ended up here, in my fucked-up head, in my messed-up life. Careful, though. You'll relate to me yet.

White-Collar Hell

Alex

W elcome to Rockefeller Center, declared a New York City Landmark in 1985, and declared a National Historic Landmark in 1987. Prestigious and crowded, affluent yet artsy, it's the perfect place to run a criminal empire, hiding right in the bleeding heart of America. Okay, more like America's moist, hairy armpit.

Stop a second, and breathe in that beautiful, industrial, stars-and-stripes pollution. Feel free and powerful yet? Before you can answer, rain starts and thunder roars, saving you from awkward indecision. No time to gawk at tourists, food trucks, or vendors selling cheap, gaudy, plastic shit. I cross to my office building and nod at the doorman, then pass below the behemoth sign that proclaims my legacy in blood-red print: Apex. It's pretentious, but so am I, and I built this kingdom from scratch, so I deserve some masturbatory decor.

Bob, stop it. You're judging me. That's not nice. What is it now? Crime or arrogance or the sign's font? It's crime? Ah, I see. Despite multiple economic depressions—sorry, “recessions,” because God forbid we panic—I'm supposed to attend college, get a degree that means shit, drown in student debt, and turn out underappreciated, undervalued, and under-everything? No. That ain't how I work.

What about scholarships? So glad you asked, Bob. Yes, what about scholarships I couldn't win because my parents couldn't afford high-rent areas with pricey private schools and showy extracurriculars? But it's my fault, right? Of course it is. I'm no poster child, so I'm labeled the problem child, ushered into shadows while some palatable kid with the same socioeconomic crutches but a better attitude takes center stage.

Oh, no, no, no, I'm not bitter, Bob. It all worked out in the end...for the most part. You either play by the rules or make your own game, and I'm a gamemaster, a troublemaker, an all-around hell-raiser.

Back to Apex.

I bask in air-conditioned ecstasy, then ride the elevator to the top, to management offices and important cubicles, if a cubicle could ever be important. Our motto perches over every doorway: Wolves cry hunger. In other words, ambition is never satisfied, and desire never rests. Clever, I know. Whiskey inspired it. That, and my poisonous appetite. I'll eat myself yet, and not in the sexy, self-fellating way—which if you can do, I commend you.

The elevator opens, and my empire awaits. Sleek and modern, bigwigs' corner offices brag leather chairs and swollen desks, and a white-cubicle checkerboard nests between glass walls. Through polished windows writhes unpolished NYC: smog, traffic, sirens, newborn thunderstorm, subways belching commuters, taxis honking at existence, and suits power-walking to immortal meetings. We even got abstract artwork on the walls, because we're cultured, dammit.

Some of my employees work here, in the office, as the reputable financial institution we make-believe. They work on NQA app updates, bug fixes, and customer service, along with insurance fraud. We target rich assholes filthy with abuse lawsuits, then hack a fake name onto their life insurance policies. After waiting an unsuspecting amount of time, my other employees—the street crew—kill them in a “freak accident.” Last, my office team uses the fake name to claim insurance, then wires blood money through a network of offshore accounts.

I offer a great split of clean and dirty work, equal opportunity for every Myers–Briggs personality. As CEO, I must provide incentives for loyalty—outside death threats. I mean, you can leave Apex, if you'd like to shorten your lifespan. But most don't leave. Most stay till retirement, another shady area with a move-off-grid-or-die ultimatum.

Why do they stay? Thanks for asking, Bob. You're not as bad as they say. But you should ask: Why wouldn't they stay? I offer top-notch salaries, six-hour workdays, unlimited PTO, early dismissal on Fridays, paid health and dental insurance (family plans, too), tuition reimbursement, free childcare, gym discounts, and pensions—benefits to keep lips shut and minds open. There are also break rooms with coffee, tea, and beer, as well as beanbags and TVs, plus annual company retreats to places like Switzerland, the Cayman Islands, Singapore, Germany, and Belize—notice a pattern? You should. Gotta check on that blood money.

Apex's perks erase morality. We kill, but we also have quarterly pizza parties with glittery strippers, and there's nothing like lust to ease your conscience. The libido is a powerful tool, and we are all reptiles at the core despite our hundred-thread-count, cotton-blend button-downs. In a world where—big breath—working-class citizens struggle beneath leagues of student debt, villainous insurance plans, soaring housing costs, and festering mental health, where most work many jobs to survive with no retirement in sight, where our overeducated generation struggles with underemployment, where financial crashes crucified our futures, where we suffocate on low wages in a stagnating job environment and shit economy, where society gaslights and strangles us, where everyone tags us as lazy and entitled in a barren market, where the world blames us for upheaval and tells us to follow in our parents' footsteps despite the changing times, common decency gets you far.

That escalated.

Anyway, I'm a savior, or so they tell me. Naked glitter parties fix all problems, just saying.

Anyway, Deja (CFO), Jorge (CTO), and Li Jie (HR manager) spot me across the floor. All three are forces of nature, so we shouldn't ignore them, Bob, regardless of your antisocial request. They're Apex's zenith—beneath me, of course—all sharks in their own right. That's why I hired them. They can smell blood and make cities bleed. But they're also kind, and kindness goes a long way. No one wants to work with a twat. Or a dick. Or a prick. Or any fucking genital. I hired the best, and I give the best freedom to work.

"Mr. Osman," Jorge greets. My employees call me Mr. Osman, and I call them their given names—rank, status, and appearance bullshit. (Bob, get back in your cage.)

"Thank God you're here," Deja says.

We thank God too often. Satan deserves the real respect.

He's responsible for all we do at Apex, if you believe. (Mom is Muslim, and Ma is Catholic, so they gave me a diverse religious upbringing.)

"Morale is down," Li Jie says. "Way down. After last month's buyout, everyone's worried about layoffs."

Last month, to pay the bills, I sold extra shares to our stockholders. Because everyone's dramatic, they called it a buyout, but I still own the vast majority of Apex.

"There will be no layoffs," I say, leaning against a cubicle. The resident employee glares up, notices me, then blushes and winks. I fucked him...maybe...after the buyout? That night was hazy.

"We know that," Deja says, "but they need reassurance." She motions toward the cubicle garden.

"You want a speech."

The bigwig trinity nods.

I sigh. "Gather VPs, managers, and supervisors—hell, get everyone, and bring them to the cafeteria."

* * *

Hungry, Bob? Grab a snack from the vending machine, then meet me by the stage.

This wasn't my afternoon plan, by the way. I'd hoped to doze in meetings, sign important papers, and nod or shake my head in vague approval or disapproval, in case my decision bites me in a week. Ambiguity has saved my ass more than once.

Moving on. You got your snack, I got my mic, so let's do this. Yes, I agree, the cafeteria is obnoxious. A three-story stadium with massive windows is excessive, but I have many employees, and they all need to eat. There's plenty of seating, rows of tables with benches, and every imaginable food and drink. Calm down, Bob. I know you know, but they don't know, so deal with exposition now and then.

Let's start. Storm paints the glass, thunder rattles the building, and lightning strobes the room—perfect for a pep talk. I take the stage. You should, too. Wait, you don't have a choice. You're stuck in my head, just like me.

"Fuck, it's hot," I say into the mic and earn chuckles all around. Shut up, Bob. Weather is the universal mediator, and profanity earns street cred. See? He's like us. We both know that's false, but let them pretend they can reach my heights—or depths.

"It's been a tough month," I continue. "For that, I apologize." From the sidelines, Deja, Jorge, and Li Jie urge me on. "Several of you have expressed concern about the buyout." Expressed concern? Expressed is forever tied to lactation for me. Grow a few kids, and every word shifts meaning. "But there's no reason to worry. There will be no layoffs, and salaries will increase by five percent over the summer." There are cheers...and relief. Money calms all fires, but we're not out of the woods yet. Best add some punch and pizzazz.

I start sucking: "You all deserve this. Never underestimate your worth. It's easy to doubt yourselves, but I never doubt you." Boost them so they ignore the shitstorm. Embrace the mania, Bob. It works.

"The older I get, the fewer fucks I give," I say. "Hoard those fucks. Don't let anyone take them away."

My employees cheer.

"You can do it. Chokeslam distrust. Punch doubt in the teeth. Hit insecurity in the throat. Elbow uncertainty in the gut."

They cheer louder.

"Slaughter negative voices. Bodycheck impostor syndrome.

Roundhouse-kick reservation. Slap hesitation in the face with a wet fish wrapped in an oily turd. Burn self-hatred in a bonfire, and toast marshmallows in the dying embers of its oozing carcass.”

They cheer their souls free, unleashed by lunacy.

“Conquer each workday. Autopsy your soul. Bare your truth, and smash a motherfucking gong.”

Note to self: Buy a motherfucking gong.

“Measure life with kindness, not money. Be kind to others, and be kind to yourself. Eviscerate this company with kindness.”

They go as crazy as I am, and I wallow in their praise. Ambiguity yields high ROI, and profits will soon jump on the validation-horny train.

“You are worthy. You deserve the stars. Believe in miracles, because you are a miracle. Let’s carry Apex into the future atop a blazing mountain of glory.”

When you give the speech that makes you question your sanity...again...for the hundredth time...

Okay, at this point, I should embrace my insanity.

Anyone else burned out? My skull is a vat of charred chicken livers blended with brain pudding. But that’s normal for me.

Great work, Bob. You were skeptical at first, but I knew you’d join in. Morale’s up, so time for a smoke break, then the dreaded meetings and paperwork. It’s hard to be me, but it’s harder to be you, shoved between neurons as you are. Let’s press on through the cosmic, septic sludge. If we’re lucky, we’ll exit this book in one piece, though you never know with Halo, the bloodthirsty savage.